There is little to admire in bureaucracy, but you've got to hand it to the Internal Revenue Service.

Mayo (EAS), President of ASEE, will direct the workshop. John Chambers, EAS professor of life science, will also participate. For further info call X2496.

Addie Harris' story is a profile in determination. Today Addie is a reference librarian at GSU completing work as a doctoral candidate but many yesterdays ago was an 11-year old school dropout in Yazoo, Mississippi. Opportunities for young black girls with no education were very limited, so she worked in the homes of whites, cleaning house and washing dishes. In 1945 she came to Chicago for a job in an ice-cream factory. The course of her life changed at this point when she joined a union and became chief steward at the factory. Aware of her lack of education, she sought to know more about unions and took a course of study at Roosevelt University. As she gained experience in the work world, she gained a desire for more education. In 1952 she began night school to obtain her eighth grade diploma. Spending some time at a library during a vacation, she found herself extremely interested in the books and inner workings of the library. She inquired about working there and found she needed a high school diploma. That led Addie to Kennedy-King College where she attended classes to pass the GED examination. Addie was on her way. She enrolled in the Library Technical program at Kennedy-King, quitting her job and becoming a full-time college student. She graduated from junior college as an honor student. At GSU she received a BA in Ethnic Studies in 1972 while working part-time in the LRC. Seeking the position she now holds Addie discovered a Masters Degree was required. Determined lady that she is, she entered the University of Illinois-Urbana and received her M.L.S. in 1974. Currently, she is working on her Ph.D through Union Graduate School. In her quiet, soft-spoken way Addie says, "I guess I am what is called a late-bloomer." Commenting on GSU, Addie said, "I like GSU, I always have. I particularly enjoy my work. Part of the beauty of GSU when I started was the fact that I could work at my own pace and style on a course best suited to me." She expressed some concern, however, that the University is changing. "It is taking a swing towards a more traditional school, losing its innovativeness which made it so unique," she said. A part of the dream that existed at GSU in the beginning was a unity between black and white. "The first caucus at GSU was integrated, blacks & whites pulling together---now we have a black caucus on one side and the whites on the other side. It was not intended to be this way in the beginning." On a more positive note Addie said, "GSU has been good for me in many ways and it is a productive University" as attested to by the success of her fellow graduate students. Addie's outside interests greatly involve her love of Afro-American Studies. She is a member of the DuSable Museum of Afro-American History where she is working to develop a Black Genealogy Society. She attends a Roundtable for African-American History Assoc. for the Study of Afro-Amer. Life which meets once a month and also Lu Palmer's Bookshelf, a group which meets to review great books each month.
