Faculty of the Communication Disorders Division, (l. to r.) Dr. Linda Forner; Dr. Jay Lubinsky, Prof. Suzanne Hildebrand, Dr. John Lowe III, chairman, and Dr. Mary E. Jones.

GSU COMMUNICATION DISORDERS PROGRAM GETS STATE APPROVAL . . . The Communication Disorders program in the School of Health Professions at GSU has gained approval by the Illinois State Board of Education, according to Dr. John Lowe III, chairman, Division of Communication Disorders.

"Program approval status is similar to the concept of accreditation," Lowe explains. "It assures certification, in speech and language impaired, by the ISBE for graduates of the Division. Included with the program approval is an option leading to supervisory endorsement for graduates and others who have completed a master's degree in speech pathology."

GSU's communication disorders program trains students to provide diagnostic, therapeutic and consultative services for persons with speech, language and/or hearing disorders. Lowe reports that the state board's analysis of the program noted that the Division "stresses high academic standards and extensive off-campus practicum experiences in schools, mental health centers and hospital settings." Lowe also indicated that the average score of GSU graduates on the national examination in speech pathology and audiology is at the 82nd percentile.

STUDENT INTERN PROGRAM . . . Women Employed, a national organization of working women based in Chicago, focuses on helping individual women with job discrimination problems, etc. The research and education division, the Women Employed Institute, conducts research projects and publishes reports on topics of concern to working women.

The organization has developed an INTERN PROGRAM for students interested in field work related to their academic specialization. Projects are designed to meet students' interests, to use their abilities, and to help them develop new skills. Internships may be fulltime for a semester or quarter or may be parttime with a minimum requirement of ten hours per week. Students interested in participating in the Intern Program should send a letter or resumé with a short description of their interests. An individual interview will be scheduled at the Women Employed office.
