NEW GSU SCULPTURE COMPLETED

"Field Rotation," the almost 4 acre sculpture created by artist Mary Miss on our campus, is now complete: the fourteenth major work in the University's Nathan Manilow Sculpture Park.

Miss referred to the truncated pinwheel shape of the main enclosed area in the center in naming the massive structure of wood, steel, concrete, stone and earth. Eight spokes of various-sized vertical poles radiate from it to the perimeter of the field.

Bill Dodd, chief executive officer of the GSU Foundation says, "It is the largest sculpture by far in the Greater Chicago Area, I believe."

The students from four states who worked on the project earned college credits in art in addition to wages.

"The practical experience they gained in the field in the past four to six weeks is at least the equivalent of a major classroom course in art," said Miss, who is a professor of art at Sarah Lawrence College.

While the construction of the project is virtually complete, it will be some time before the environmental sculpture takes on a finished look. The soil in the mound around the pinwheel has settled. Two large piles of top soil have been spread over the embankment, and the entire site is being plowed and tilled. It will be seeded this fall using a special grass with controlled growth features. By next spring, Bill anticipates, the whole sculpture will look like it grew there.
